The tables for the 1881 and 1899 Senatorial elections are presented differently from those for the other elections. Whereas the other tables present a vote by vote description of each election, the complexity of these two are such that such a table would be more confusing than informative. In both cases, the election involved a battle between the two segments of a bitterly divided Republican Party. As a result, neither Republican faction nor the Democratic candidate were able to muster enough votes to win.

In order to allow the legislators some flexibility in their personal lives during these marathon events, a practice known as "pairing" came into use whereby a legislator could absent himself from a session if he could get a supporter of the opposition to agree to absent himself as well. In so doing, each legislator involved could avoid giving an advantage to the other side.

Efforts to make up a chart showing pairings, absences, and refusals to vote when present makes it virtually impossible to track the ebb and flow of the votes. Accordingly this chart in most cases shows non-voting members as supporting the candidate for which they cast their vote immediately prior to their absenting themselves from the process. There was far less movement between candidates than had been the case in 1881, the Quay machine being far stronger than the aging Cameron machine 18 years earlier.

The 1899 Senatorial election was the most bitterly fought in Pennsylvania history, dragging on for 79 ballots over 90 days without producing a winner. There were strong similarities with the 1881 election in that the Pennsylvania Republican Machine, now headed by Matthew Quay, was opposed by an anti-machine faction within the party, as well as by the Democrats. Unfortunately, the Republican opposition was not unified and was unable to secure an advantage out of the fact that Quay was under indictment for misuse of funds.

As in 1881 the business community had an interest in the elections. Quay's bitterest enemy appears to have been John Wanamaker, Pennsylvania's most prominent merchant, although Wanamaker had no interest in holding office himself. Alvin Markle was building a small traction empire in the area in and around Hazleton and Peter A. B. Widener was arguably the most powerful public utilities magnate in the region. Unlike 1881, when the Republican factions finally hammered out a compromise, there would be no compromise in 1899. The anti-Quay Republicans did not unify their forces until the 60th ballot, then engaged in a curious exercise of switching candidates on each ballot in the vain hope that they could attract enough support to overthrow the Quay forces.

The deadlock turned the election into a farce. Established rules required at least one ballot every day except Sunday. While this policy was faithfully followed, there was seldom anything approaching a quorum present on Saturdays and most Mondays. The low point was on 25 March when only ten legislators out of 254 appeared for the rollcall.

The adjourning of the Legislature on 19 April ended the confrontation without resolution. Quay was acquitted by a friendly court the following day and the governor immediately appointed him to fill the vacancy. Unfortunately, governors did not have that power until the constitution was amended to provide for popular election more than a decade later and the Senate refused to seat Quay. The seat remained vacant for a year when the new legislature returned Quay to Washington.

While the Quay fiasco would be a low point in Pennsylvania politics, the state was not alone at the time. It had become evident that the existing system of electing Senators by state legislatures didn't work. One report claimed that there were 45 deadlocks in 20 different states in the period between 1891 and 1905.

At the same time that Quay was fighting for reelection in 1899, a more spectacular battle was going on next door in Delaware. John Edward Addicks, a millionaire Pennsylvania native who had made a fortune in public utilities in the Northeast, had decided that he would like to be a Senator and established residence in Delaware where he funded a revival of the Republican Party. The struggle between Addicks and Henry duPont for control of the state government led to a battle over Delaware's Senate seats which dragged on until 1905. This struggle led to Delaware having both of its Senate seats vacant at one point. Still the 1899 Pennsylvania election provided another argument for election reform which was brought about by the 17th Amendment to the Constitution in 1913.
